Did You Burn or Get Extra Red from Waxing?

Thursday July 23, 2009

So you've been getting waxed for years, then out of nowhere the waxing was extra painful and more red than normal, or even looks like you have been burned. Before you go blaming the wax technician, something else could be the culprit- powerful exfoliators. But you say, "I don't get chemical peels or use strong products like RetinA, salicylic acid or alpha-hydroxy acid."

Because exfoliating removes dead skin cells and makes skin look brighter and clearer, skin care companies put exfoliators like salicylic acid or alpha-hydroxy acid (AHAs) in their cleansers, toners, serums and even make-up. A little in each item you're putting on your face adds up. Since salicylic acid, alpha-hydroxy acid and waxing all strip skin cells- it's all too much exfoliation combined. This could make skin red, bleed or even turn scabby. So if you have changed skin care products, make-up or are adding more anti-aging steps to your beauty routine, that could be what's having you see red.

Read more about waxing precautions for circumstances or conditions when skin is extra sensitive or when to stay away from waxing entirely. Other hair removal methods like threading, sugaring and tweezing still remove the hair from the root, but don't exfoliate the skin as much as waxing.
